

The Unhappy
TAYLER OR

Loves Fatal Farwel, being a Tragical Relation of one

James Orde a Tayler;

Who Hang'd himself on Sunday Morning in the new Buildings near Lamb's Conduit, for Love of a Young Maiden who slighted his Courtship.

To the Tune of Johnson's Farewell

Licensed according to Order.

Come all Rash Lovers pray draw near,
and hear what I shall tell,
Of one who lately did despair,
and for that cause he fell:
He was a Tailor brisk and brave, who lov'd a handsome Maid,
And did for speedy Marriage crave, but she the same delaid.

Which drove him to such discontent, that he no rest could find,
Both Night and Day he did lament,
to see his Love unkind,
And took the same so much to heart,
in silence he did grieve,
Such was the force of Cupid's Dart, that none could him relieve.

Until at last despair and grief united to their Power, His Case was far beyond relief,
sad Fate must him devour, For having got a slender Roap on Sunday-morning last,
As one being void of future hope, he hang'd himself in last.

In the New-building near the Field,
his Body it was found,
Where heto fatal death did yield, tho' his feet touch'd the Ground:

Which did amaze all thole who see his sad and dismal fate, Because that Loves unkind Decree, had thus cut off his date.

About him were some Letters found,
Which plainly seem'd to tell,
Dispare had on him gain'd such ground,
In peace he could not Dwell Likewise he did desire all,
Who heard of his sad Fate
To take example by his Fall, Before it was too late.

His Sweet heart she no sooner hears,
This sad and Doleful newes
But she with Sorrows Grief and Tears
All comfort doth refuse,
For her unkindness to her Dear,
She doth Lament and Morn,
'Cause to him she was so severe As her True Love to scorn.

Oh! all Young Maid's (quoth she beware
How you true Love dispise, Least you like me, bring on dispare,
Make Love a sacrifice
I freely wou'd give all I have,
To bring him back again,
But tis too late his Life to save My sighs are all in vain.

London, Printed for John Alkin, 1699.